The Mistletoe Girl

By IZOLA L. FORRESTER

ISABEL paused on the last step and drew on her gray suede gloves thoughtfully. The only touch of relief in her gray costume was the spray of scarlet holly berries that lay against her squirrel stole.

"But if he should come while we are gone," she said.

Mrs. Dexter looked up at her inquiringly, also admiringly, as a contented mother may look at a debutante daughter who has fulfilled every expectation.

"He might wait," she suggested. Isabel frowned slightly.

"He doesn't like to be kept waiting."

"Not by others," murmured Mrs. Dexter, discreetly, "but when it is you, dear—"

Isabel laughed and shrugged her shoulders as she fastened the last button.

As the carriage went down the avenue Isabel bent forward to watch the crowd of Christmas promenaders.

"I ordered the holly and mistletoe yesterday," Mrs. Dexter was saying, ruminatively. "The flowers came last night, all except the table decorations. They are to be there by 11. Betty said she would look after them."

"She has my chiffon dress to change before dinner," said Isabel.

Mrs. Dexter bowed her head in comfortable abstraction.

"She can do both."

Isabel smiled quizzically at her tone.

Suddenly the smile vanished and she leaned toward the window eagerly to catch a glimpse of a tall figure as it turned into Fifth avenue.

"There is Mr. Wade now," she said. "Shall we go back?"

She hesitated, a slight flush tinting her face as she sank back against the maroon cushions.

"No," she continued. "I think he will wait."

The carriage passed without Wade's recognition of its occupants. He walked on up the avenue, his hands deep in his pockets, his chin uplifted belligerently.

He would see her at all costs. If he asked for her alone, they could not keep her from him. Heretofore in his calls it had been Isabel, as a matter of course, who received him. But to-day was Christmas, and he carried a Christmas greeting to the girl he loved.

The ladies were both out, Gifford told him at the door. Would he wait?

"Miss Betty is hanging mistletoe in the study for the ball to-night," explained Gifford.

"I will wait there," said Wade, and Gifford stood alone in the hall, looking at a $5 gold piece which had reached his palm suddenly.

She was trying to hammer a small brass hook into the archway, and was singing softly. Wade thought as he let the portieres fall behind him that he had never heard "Hark, the Herald Angels Sing," sound quite so sweet in all his life.

"Merry Christmas," he said, and Betty dropped the hammer.

"I said Merry Christmas," he repeated, laughing up at her.

"Please pick up the hammer," said Betty, sedately. "You mustn't bother me."

Wade laid the hammer on the table.

"You can't hammer in a hook. It screws in. Let me do it."

Betty sat down on top of the ladder.

"Everybody's out," she remarked, irrelevantly.

"I'm glad of it," responded Wade, composedly.

"Isabel's out, too."

There was a long silence. Betty's chin was resting on one hand. The other held a bunch of mistletoe ready for hanging on the hook, and she looked down at the tiny, pearly berries meditatively. Wade walked to the window and back again to the base of the footladder.

"Don't you know that I want to see only you, Betty?" he asked.

Betty hung the bunch of mistletoe in place with unsteady fingers. He could not see her face.

"I'm very busy, Mr. Wade. You know Aunt Octavia gives a ball to-night. The decorators did all the rooms except for the mistletoe, and I am to put all of that up."

"You are always busy."

A trace of sadness came over the lovely girlish face.

"They are all very kind to me," she said, bravely. "I like to help, and feel that I am needed."

There was the cound of carriage wheels on the avenue outside. As they stopped before the house Wade's jaws squared with determination. He held up his arms to the figure in black on the stepladder.

"Betty, I need you most, sweetheart," he said. "Won't you come to me?"

The portieres at the end of the room parted, and for an instant Mrs. Dexter and Isabel paused at sight of the picture before them. At the foot of the ladder stood Wade, with Betty held closely in his arms, his lips pressed to hers.

"Elizabeth!" exclaimed Mrs. Dexter, as she caught her breath.

Wade raised his head, his eyes brimful of merriment.

"It's all right, Mrs. Dexter," he said, cheerily. "We're under the mistletoe, and Betty's just promised to be the only mistletoe girl in the world for me. Merry Christmas!"—Boston Globe.
